This is a view from the van of the sun coming up over the mountains. There were always spectacular views everywhere we went.

Looking down at Machupicchu from the top of Waynapicchu.
This is a friend I met during the climb to the top of Waynapicchu. He lives in Lima, Peru and was visiting for the day. The people were always nice.

A view of the trail to the top of Waynapicchu. It was mostly the stairs the entire climb.
This picture shows how well all the ancient stone structures were constructed with just simple tools.

This is a panoramic picture looking down on Cuzco. The beautiful houses and scenery made this my favorite city of the trip.
This is me at the top of Waynapicchu.

This picture shows the view coming up the street to our hotel. It is very different from America, but still very pretty.
This shows the incredible construction of stairs through the middle of a boulder. There was a trail that wrapped around so you could reach the top.
While I was hiking one of the trails, I turned a corner and found a double rainbow.

Another view from a stop that we made that shows vast mountains and terraces.
This is a picture I took just before sunset as we were riding back to the Hostel.

This shows how the mountains can pop out all the time.
One of the native ladies making a blanket. These take a month to make.

A llama doing what he does best.
This is a picture of my favorite ruins from the trip. To see these in person is amazing.